Not illustrated. 1818 Excerpt: ...was sure that the affording protection to the unfortunate children who were the objects of this bill could not be called interfering either with a free or a fair trade. What he conceived ought to be the principle which should guide their lordships in a case of this kind was, that no persons should be permitted to impose on others, and especially on children, any labour calculated to injure their health or impair their bodily strength. This was what no individual ought to be allowed to do for his own advantage; and he never could suppose that their lordships would give their sanction to the continuance of a trade in which such a practice prevailed, especially as it appeared that it could be done away with at a very inconsiderable expense. He had been fully persuaded that to convince their lordships that the practice could be abolished was all that was necessary to induce them to agree to the bill. With this view he had entered into the investigation; and it would be found, that though there had been much contradictory evidence, yet that, after all that had been stated by persons of the utmost experience, the preponderance was greatly in favour of the abolition of the practice. In the mean time, an address had been voted by their lordships, for the purpose of causing an experiment as to the practicability of using machinery, to be made by the surveyor-general. That experiment had already commenced on a very extensive scale, and sixty of the most difficult chimnies had been swept without any failure. The result of the experiment would afterwards be considered by a board composed of bricklayers and masons; but it was obviously impossible that this investigation could be brought to a conclusion during the present session. On that account he could not now press t...
